INTRODUCTION

Public procurement and public financial management are central to delivering goods and services to citizens and allowing governments to achieve their public policy goals. As one of the largest categories of governments' spending, public procurement should be mainstreamed and well-integrated with the public financial management system. The procurement, budget and financial management systems should interact closely: once procurement decisions are made, corresponding actions should be initiated on the budget and financial side. On the other hand, there should be safeguards in the system precluding initiation of procurement actions unless funds have been allocated to the procurement in question, and audit institutions should oversee the correct use of public funds devoted to buying goods and services.

The Public Expenditure and Financial Accountability (PEFA) and the Methodology for Assessing Procurement Systems (MAPS) are internationally recognized assessment frameworks that evaluate the public financial management and procurement systems of any country. Their methodologies are interlinked and inform each other. This webinar will be an opportunity to learn how the two tools work together and discuss the country case of Zambia where both assessments were carried out. Participants will gain a practical understanding of the links between the two methodologies and acquire evidence of their usefulness for improving the public financial management and procurement systems.
